Description

On some pages, we have a lot of big h1 headings:

Help needed!

Got time, a computer and a brain? Here is how you can help:

Improve Documentation (Scribble!)

A complex system like ours needs a lot of documentation. And despite the complexity that documentation should be easy and fun to read. Right?

Tasks: Proof reading existing documentation, writing new documentation, translations (at a later stage)

Skills needed: Writing skills and very good english are a must, experience with DocBook XML would help

Test and Report Problems (Zing!)

We don't code bugs, at least not on purpose. But if you find one, report it in our issue tracker. But please help us to solve it by attaching a detailed description of how to reproduce the issue. If you can provide a unit test that shows the bug, this rocks big time.

Tasks: Find bugs, describe them, reproduce them in a unit test

Skills needed: Attention to detail, knowledge about PHP and PHPUnit is a plus

Work on the Code (Yeah!)

You found a bug? Have an idea for a missing feature? Found clever solution to an open task? Just write the code and submit it to us for inclusion. Do it on a regular basis and become famous. So they say.

Tasks: Write clean and useful code

It would look better if only the first heading was big and the other were h2. The question is if we should create a style for csc-firstHeader or just use h2 manually in the content elements.
