I don't know...

If you want my opinion, the usage of the toggle control (instead of the checkbox) is ... how can I say it... abused && misused throughout t the whole backend and I would hope that someday a serious discussion could be started about it.

To my knowledge the "Toggle" UI element should be used only when the change is immediately persisted and immediately takes effect and no further action (like a "confirm" or "save") is required; the metaphor behind it is: it's like the light switch of your room: when you use it, the light is on, and you don't have to confirm your order.
